BAINS DE VENASQUE. --POSADA. THE FORT. SOL DIERS SUPPER. AN ADVENTURE. The stars were still glimmering in the heavens as we walked our horses over the still and vacant space which a few hours back had been all life and revelry. Not a soul was now to be seen, except the solitary sentinel, pacing to and fro by the Concijo, whose footsteps echoed down the silent streets adjoining the Plaza. The damask streaks purpling in the eastern hemisphere, and gradually assuming a brighter tint, announced the splendour of the sun's rise, which in a short time burst upon the mountain world before us in dazzling glory. Even Jean, accustomed as he was to behold the sun open on his native mountains, stopped his horse, and even his pipe, to contemplate for a minute or two the magnificent spectacle which presented itself. We had already commenced the ascent of one of those stupendous mountains of the Spanish Pyrenees, interminable in extent, and thickly covered with superb trees. From time to time an opening displayed the valley we had now quitted for the last time, and the distant perspective of its opposite mountains over whose enormous masses the sun was now majestically beaming, till we were at length lost to the world in the wild obscurity of the forest. We had pursued our route in...
