A cable, therefore, when receiving the moderate or small oscillating currents which may originate in a transformer, gives only very low oscillating voltages, that is, acts as a short circuit for the transformer oscillation, and therefore protects the latter. Inversely, if the large oscillating current of a cable enters a reactive device, as a current transformer, it produces enormous voltages therein. Thus, cable oscillations are more liable to be destructive to the reactive apparatus, transformers, etc., connected with the cable, than to the cable itself. A transmission line is intermediate in the values of Z_0 and t/o between the cable and the reactive apparatus, thus acting like a reactive apparatus to the former, like a cable toward the latter. Thus, the transformer is protected by the transmission line in oscillations originating in the transformer, but endangered by the transmission line in oscillations originating in the transmission line. The simple consideration of the relative values of $z_0 = y$ in the different parts of an electric system thus gives considerable information on the relative danger and protective action of the parts on each other, and shows the reason why some elements, as current transformers, are far more liable to destruction than others; but also shows that disruptive effects of transient voltages, observed in one apparatus, may not and very frequently do not originate in the damaged apparatus, but originate in another part of the system, in which they were relatively harmless, and...
