Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Report of the International Ice Patrol in the North Atlantic, Vol. 90: 2004 Season, Bulletin No; 90, Cg-188-59 Forwarded herewith is Bulletin No.90 of the International Ice Patrol, describing Ice Patrols services and ice observations and conditions during the 2004 season. Opening on 27 April, the 2004 season marked the latest opening date on record. Warmer-than-normal winter temperatures off the Labrador coast coupled with a series of powerful low-pressure systems during January resulted in limited sea-ice growth and the destruction of icebergs that would normally reach the shipping lanes during February and March. Though a light season, the following Core Values governed Ice Patrol activity, ensuring continued operational excellence: Partnerships Built on the Spirit of International Cooperation Continuous Improvement through the Use of Technology Individual Commitment to the HP Mission Nowhere is the spirit of international cooperation better demonstrated than in the collaborative work of the North American Ice Service, in which HP became one of three component services in 2004, joining the U.S. National Ice Center and the Canadian Ice Service. Ice Patrols participation in this group sparked continuous process improvement, particularly in upgrading the iceberg drift and deterioration model (outlined in Appendix E). HP continued to validate the use of satellites for detecting and identifying icebergs (Appendix D).While much work is still needed, this technology holds hope for the future of iceberg reconnaissance, hi addition, HP looks to its history to inspire commitment to the mission. The cover of this years report depicts one of several iceberg-destruction experiments. Appendix Cis a fascinating article documenting the history of these experiments. Although we have been unsuccessful in our attempts to destroy icebergs, the crew of...
